

FCSI MEMBER BENEFITS

Recognized Professionalism

Clients searching for consultants look first to the professional organizations representing these specialists. Like other qualifying groups, members of FCSI have access to work that is often not available to non-members.

Networking

FCSI coordinates a network of professionals for the purpose of education and the exchange of ideas. This invaluable resource of individuals in foodservice consulting is unparalleled in the industry. FCSI members have the opportunity to learn from one another and tap into an immense pool of expertise.

Website

FCSI's website provides you with easy access to Society information, including updated event details and a member directory. With this online directory, you will find information on fellow members, including their contact details and web site address.

Referral service

Through the use of a sophisticated database, FCSI staff can accurately match consultants with potential customers. This service provides clients with instant access to consultants by specific geographical areas and by specific disciplines.

Trade show participation

FCSI exhibits at a number of industry trade shows throughout the year, promoting both membership in FCSI and the benefits of hiring FCSI consultant members. Members are encouraged to volunteer to learn more about their association, as well as meet other FCSI members and staff.

Intra-industry alliances

FCSI has formed affiliations with other allied professional groups serving the foodservice and hospitality industries. FCSI is in close contact with all operator/client-driven organizations. Many of these associations invite our members to participate in programs, seminars and other events.

Publications

Foodservice Consultant is FCSI's first-rate quarterly magazine featuring the latest member and Society news, profiles of member projects and reports on new trends and techniques. Each must-read issue contains many articles submitted by members and other recognized professionals in the foodservice industry.